

Lab 2

Strategy

As suggested in the lab description, I employed a point-based system to track a URL's probability of being a malware vehicle. This probability, designated as "mal_prob" in the script, starts at a neutral score of zero.

First, the script runs through the entire JSON file to gather averages for domain age, Alexa rank, and number of path and domain tokens in each URL. This is vital to the strategy, because each record's respective values for these fields are compared to the average. If there is an exceptional deviation from that average, the URL gets a bit more attention in the form of a slightly increasing mal_prob.

A very new domain name or a page missing an Alexa rank does not necessarily mean that the resource is hazardous, but it contributes to that suspicion. Some properties add to the mal_prob more than others. For example, a URL using a port other than 80 is extremely unusual and is therefore worth two points.

Likewise, it's not necessarily an indicator of maliciousness when a URL has a great number of path and domain tokens, but if it has a greater number of both tokens than the average URL in the collection, the script can account for that accordingly. Only an equal number of detractions (e.g. the domain is fairly high in Alexa rankings) can reduce the mal_prob score to a balanced, non-suspicious level of zero or less.

A maliciousness probability threshold of 4 proved to be far too permissive and only captured between 12 and 19 percent of threats. Surprisingly, even a score of 2 (that is, only two indicators) allowed too many links to appear legitimate. Therefore, the chosen threshold is any positive mal_prob value. This rendered a correct 50 percent tally, which was proven to be over 80 percent accurate when run on the "train.json" file and compared to the existing "malicious_url" fields.

To improve this weight-based method, I would have to implement more conditional statements that decrement the mal_prob score. Too many of the factors considered can just be circumstantial evidence and sloppiness on the part of a web developer. It would also be helpful to have a test to compare the domain name against a well-populated "white-list," which would drop the score considerably.

Taking these measures would allow for a more aggressive strategy in weeding out suspect URLs without worrying about concurrently raising the number of false positives.
